MANIFESTO

Politics is the art of transformation, and an individual becomes truly free by actively choosing to change.
Aggregation, dialogue, shared analysis of problems, and the proposal of solutions are the foundations of democracy, and it is necessary to apply them concretely if we want to be protagonists of the future.

Since the war in Ukraine, the European Union's weaknesses have become clear. Its Member States often struggle to take a unified, coordinated stance. While they are formally united by common values, this moral harmony has frequently translated into decision-making paralysis, weakening our international credibility and delaying humanitarian responses. We have become a chessboard on which others play, exposing our indecision.

The root of this problem is cultural: it is necessary to shape a European popular identity, built through spaces where people can meet, confront ideas, and develop joint proposals. A people's identity grows through dialogue, diversities, and the shared desire to shape the future.

Out of this awareness, the European Youth Movement emerges, not to impose a priori solutions, but to give new generations the possibility to build a common and coordinated European political line.
We unite the young people of Europe, regardless of their political positions, united by the will to find common answers together, through reasoned debate and the construction of a popular network of personal knowledge.

This process of aggregation triggers a virtuous circle: it strengthens quality information, founded on attention to content and on shared enthusiasm for active participation. Every form of common confrontation must indeed be backed by in-depth individual research. Transparency, critical analysis, and intellectual rigor are essential tools to elevate the quality of debates and, consequently, to assert the practical credibility of our proposals.

The objectives of the E.Y.M. can therefore be summarized in two points:

- Shaping identity through the community
  By getting to know one another and embracing different realities, we can truly feel like European citizens and by following a shared political path, we create the conditions to act together.
- Debate to propose
  Social, cultural, and political differences are not obstacles—they are the foundation for debate, for building common political positions, and for turning these positions into concrete political action that unites vision with respect for diversity.

The European Youth Movement is born as an act of political and cultural responsibility.
United, we build a shared European consciousness and transform it into action.

STRUCTURE

The organizational structure of the movement has been designed to uphold its founding principle of aggregation and to ensure a high quality of debate.

The political core of the movement consists of Thematic Groups, which are discussion spaces organized around specific policy areas (such as Foreign Policy, Defence, Justice, Education, etc.). Members are free to choose which groups to join according to their skills and interests. This approach allows issues to be addressed in a rigorous and focused manner, while fostering diversity among active participants.
Each Thematic Group is overseen by a coordinating body responsible for guiding discussions towards the development of a coherent political position, by defining an operational plan and setting clear objectives.
The coordinator and the coordinating body do not decide which specific topics are to be addressed; their sole role is to channel discussions towards the formulation of an organic and shared position.
Any participant may propose a new discussion topic which, once collectively approved by the group, becomes part of the internal debate.
The shared perspectives and debates that emerge are periodically consolidated by the coordinators into Position Papers, which outline the movement's specific policy stances.

The outcomes of the Thematic Groups are then made public through the movement's media platforms by the Communication Group. Positions are formalized and communicated in a coherent, accessible, and credible manner, in line with the work produced by the Thematic Groups. Close and continuous collaboration between the coordinators of these bodies is ensured.
The Communication Group is structured around a central coordination unit and several functional sub-teams:

1. Editorial Team – responsible for drafting texts, policy analysis, fact-checking, and adapting content for public communication.
2. Digital & Media Team – responsible for social media, website, newsletters, and video content.
3. Press and External Relations – responsible for press releases, relations with journalists, and engagement with media outlets and partners.

Each country has its own National Group, whose role is to bring participants together in person, collect feedback from local members, and translate shared positions into concrete initiatives. National Coordinators act as representatives of the movement at the national level, but their role is purely operational and serves as an interface with the Steering Committee, ensuring smooth coordination with other Member States. They do not define the political line of the movement, but instead propose topics, priorities, and critical issues that contribute to the development of discussions.
National Groups are also responsible for organizing public events and building local networks at both local and broader scales. In addition, the movement regularly commits to organizing in-person events where members from across Europe can meet and engage in collective discussions.

The Steering Committee represents the highest coordination and management body of the movement.
Its primary role is to ensure synergy among the Thematic Groups, National Groups, and the Communication Group, while supervising and setting strategic priorities.
It:

- Approves activity plans and major projects, monitors the implementation of decisions, and intervenes in cases of stalemate or critical issues.
- Ensures transparency, coherence, and compliance with established rules in decision-making processes.
- Represents the Movement towards institutions, networks, and partners, manages external relations, and authorizes the public positions that emerge from internal work.

The Steering Committee does not impose the political line of the movement; rather, it defines it in full continuity with the work of the Thematic Groups, ensuring the highest level of integration.
